The past decades have seen many different ways of modeling cognitive decline in aging and its relation to Alzheimer's disease. However, age-related changes in cognitive performance are not homogeneous but rather display considerable heterogeneity. This applies in particular to measures of memory. Although some aspects of memory decline are well understood, others (e.g., forgetting) remain largely unexplained. In this article, I propose a neural circuit model for memory that is based on anatomical and physiological evidence. The rationale for the model is that, although brain areas such as the hippocampus are fundamental for memory functions, memory consolidation does not occur solely in the hippocampus; rather, it involves interaction between different brain areas, for which different kind of synapses are required. The model is designed to accommodate several phenomena that are characteristic of cognitive aging and/or Alzheimer's disease, such as general slowing, short- and long-term memory decline, backward masking, and frontal lobe-dependent memory decline. Moreover, the model can account for different types of forgetting. Want to enjoy cannabis nationwide?
