The Magic Bullet Suite is a blend of Adobe's Mobile App and Photo editing tools. One can say that there is no single best photo editor out there that can help you make great pictures with limited knowledge. But Magic Bullet can help you make some decent shortcuts and discover what you don't know. The first thing you get on Airpods is the Magic Toolkit. In this app you get basics such as the color picker, the color palette and Adobe filters. You also get presets for faces, portraits, animals, landscapes, etc. and the hue and light/dark tool. The equivalent of "the app" in the printed world for us, is the coloring books that are available with this app. This is a repackaging of the "Light and Dark" preset pack conveniently bundled with Adobe software. Selecting the color palette to make adjustments is easy, as is switching between the color palette and the photo. Depending on the situation, you can use one or the other mode. There is also a tilt-counterbalance mode, something that even Apple doesn't offer in their editing apps. The classic color picker mode is on by default, but the color palette and photo response modes are configurable from the system settings menu. I personally switched to the photo response mode, so that I could make filmic or darkroom adjustments to my images before sharing them. There is a full color spectrum, a custom hue, contrast, brightness, saturation and gamma settings. Try not to click on the transform tool or perspective grid if you like seeing your image close up. In the settings menu there is a motion blur setting. I use it a lot because it makes your image seem like it's out of focus. You can disable motion blur in the annotation mode to make the tracker easier to use.
