ABOVE: iOS 9.2 includes a new autocomplete feature that can complete a one line search term with a rich auto suggestion list, as shown here on an iPad Pro. BELOW: The Apple Pencil is a fantastic tool for iPad Pro, allowing for extensive ink strokes and control over how you apply them. For a few years now, I have been using - and loving - Lightroom from Adobe. It is a great camera image management tool. I first bought it when it was just Image Capture, then later Image Producer, and then Image Lab, Lightroom, Lightroom Mobile, and Lightroom CC. I have come to question, who should use LR 5.2?; some real pros and some children players who don't know anything about it.

I know many people who have only a PC and this (PC) version has always been their primary image editor. Now 8 hours for an update,? easier than to adapt to a new interface!

Is there a single person who spends hours to make an image, but is now lazy to do this new software?

I do not know who will have their new creations corrupted by the beta. Who will not play well with the new version?

Currently, I'm waiting for the final release. Is it possible that the version history panel which shows older versions of a cloud document were deleted? This would certainly explain people's comments about updating to the beta. In the current release it doesn't seem possible to revert to an earlier version. I don't see a change log in the beta as there was in the previous releases. It seems to me that it is possible to update from 5.2 to later versions, but only after relaunching the application with a clean download. You would think that this would not happen, at least not often.

  All images that have been taken with your camera have a main layer. This is the main background layer that all other layers will be composed on top of. This main layer should be the last layer to be deleted from your image. Once you have removed the top layer and replaced it with only the background layer itself, you can use its Edit menu to Merge Down the layer to turn it into a regular layer, change its blending mode, merge it with other layers, or simply turn it into a layer mask. That's right, layer masks allow you to mask out the parts of the layer that you don't want to appear in your image.
