At the heart of Photoshop is the revolutionary Inspector panel. It provides a window into the entire document, from all viewing angles, so you can view all your layers and see exactly what's on every page. It's also the place to set and adjust the appearance of individual colors, and when you change an object's color, it automatically updates every other object that uses that color. This way, when you edit one layer for a new project, changes on that layer automatically update all other layers in the same document, and match your expectations. You also have access to powerful color and tone manipulation tools like edit masks, which can intelligently apply one color or shape to everything within an image, even those parts that are behind other layers. While Photoshop introduced a lot of new possibilities to web designers, as well as advanced developers, it has also been heavily criticized because of the heavy dependence on the native client. In order for customers to access their files, they required a plugin, which was necessary in determining a workaround for browsers. So did this plug-in depend on a specific browser or operating system? Unfortunately, it was the latter. The Adobe Photoshop JavaScript API allows developers to access the full power and capabilities of Photoshop from the web. Not only can the API be used for content creation tools, such as the Content-Aware Fill, but it is also extensively used by the web team to implement several of the core features available to the user such as smart guides, auto-linking, auto-cropping, and many more. e3d0a04c9c
